Audiences' Expectations of Regulators and Producers

Only in Turkmenistan is there no such discussion. The cold war is over and international power dynamics are more complex and multifaceted as a result. In the Middle East and North Africa the main sign of movement comes from pan-regional television, which is consciously casting itself as public service in its ethos; and government control over broadcasting at the national level is coming under pressure and is the subject of growing debate and tentative moves toward reform.

New Roles for Public Television in Western Europe: Challenges and Prospects, Journal of Communication

In Zimbabwe, the supreme court has struck down laws restricting freedom of expression as unconstitutional on a number of occasions, breaking a government monopoly on providing telecommunications services, striking down a prohibition on publishing false news, and ruling out the government broadcasting monopoly. Amartya Sen, the Nobel Prize winning economist, has argued consistently and forcefully since the early 1980s that no substantial famine has ever occurred in any independent country with a democratic form of government and a relatively free press.

Giving the Audience a Voice: The Role of Research in Making Media Regulation More Responsive to the Needs of the Audience on JSTOR

The capacity of nominally independent regulators to be effective can be undermined by corruption, negligence, or bureaucratic inertia. More directly related to broadcasting, a team of researchers undertook a study in 2001 of the ownership of the top five Page 50television channels in 97 countries around the world. All of these factors matter, and governments can take measures to establish or reinforce them.
