Section II briefly describes the facts on capital flows to these countries.

Attractiveness of Central and Eastern European Countries for Foreign Direct Investment in the Context of European Integration: The Case of Estonia

Varfis and Versino 1992 compare SOMs to the well-established techniques of principal component analysis and hierarchical clustering; sequentially mining the same data set with each technique, they find that Kohonen maps are a worthy alternative to the older techniques.

Capital Flows to Central and Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union

Spanning eleven time zones and nearly half of the meridians in the northern hemisphere, Russia possesses unmatched internal diversity within the group of countries included in this investigation and therefore confounds classification as a single country that either is or is not suitable for investment, EU expansion, or any other conceptual category. The social protection system is not the same in France as in Great Britain or Japan.
