Marketing identities: the invention of Jewish ethnicity in Ost und West

Not surprisingly, Jewish university students were highly susceptible to conversion. At the same time— using a similar strategy—the magazine tried to reach out to German Jews by adapting negative stereotypes of Ostjuden: elements of these stereotypes were transferred onto representations of Westjuden. The high number of Jewish conversions after 1871— higher than at any other time in German history—shows the relative ease with which this step was taken.
