VE teachers can use various strategies to enhance their performance and effectiveness through professional development. Case studies of facilitators' practices revealed areas of the training that impacted the skills and strategies that facilitators used in efforts to foster increased and improved dialogue. Findings suggest that teachers express a positive view of PBL as a learning approach.

Although children with high externalizing behaviors tended to experience declining social preference over the course of the school year, teachers' learner-centered practices attenuated this progression. Qualitative analysis of data collected from these reflective dialogues along with informal and formal classroom observations of instructional practice uncovered diverse perceptions regarding the implementation of inquiry-based methods into present teaching practice. The school environment and teachers play important roles in helping students develop healthy eating habits.

There is, however, little research documenting experienced teachers' classroom practices and their beliefs on why they teach the way they do. In this study, the knowledge, attitudes, and eating behaviors of prospective teachers as determinants of intended classroom food practices and the school environment and its potential impact on classroom food practices were examined and explored. It means the power of the teacher to exercise his judgement of what, why, how, when and why to teach.
