Marriage of Artist Novel and Bildungsroman. Goethe's Wilhelm Meister: A Paradigm in

Goethe is the poet of details, not of unity; of analysis, not of synthesis. The plans for his future that his father had meticulously designed were well on the way to fruition! They do, however, take careful count of some unhappy moments, in which, wearied out by the emptiness of life, he has raised with remorse I am sure the cup of ignoble pleasures to his lips, believing he might find forgetfulness there. Once again it was love at first sight when he saw Friederike.

Whether he studies the rose exhaling its Eastern perfume of the sky, or the ocean casting its countless wrecks upon the shore, the brow of the poet remains equally calm: to him they are but two forms of the beautiful; two subjects for art.

They have never realized the conception of Humanity in the multitudes that have preceded, surround, and will follow after them; never thought on their own place between the past and future; on the continuity of labor that unites all the generations into one whole; on the common end and aim, only to be realized by the common effort; on the spiritual post-sepulchral life even on earth of the individual, through the thoughts he transmits to his fellows; and, it may be when he lives devoted and dies in faith through the guardian agency he is allowed to exercise over the loved ones left on earth.

Hence that terrible unity which only the superficial reader could mistake for monotony. I know not if, in his numerous pieces of criticism, he has ever spoken of Dante; but assuredly he must have shared the antipathy felt for him by Sir Walter Scott; and although he would undoubtedly have sufficiently respected his genius to admit him into his Pantheon, yet he would certainly have drawn a veil between his mental eye and the grand but sombre figure of the exiled seer, who dreamed of the future empire of the world for his country, and of the world's harmonious development under her guidance.

Both are the children of fatality for it is especially at the close of epochs that the providential law which directs the generations assumes towards individuals the semblance of fatality and compelled by it unconsciously to work out a great mission.
