. On the one hand, a polemic that runs from one treatise to another notably in the mDzod bdun seems to be aimed at a certain follower of this school, whom we have not identified. A master by the name of bKra shis rin chen also appears in the chapter devoted to the various lineages of the Kālacakra in Tibet; but, in the absence of historical indications or sufficient context, it is difficult to equate him with any certainty with the personage before us.

Saved in: Bibliographic Details Gtsaṅ mṅ Zaiṅ žui gi Bon khod gsaṅ ba drag chen gyi sgrub pa las tshogs bcas kyi gsun pod : a collection of texts from the rediscoveries of Dpon-gsas Khyuñ-rgod-rtsal concerned with the Bonpo deities of the Ge-khod cycle and their propitiation. He often alludes to it in a vague and general way, but there is nothing in his known work to show that he had a deep personal knowledge of the Klong sde, and, moreover, the master of Gangs ri thod dkar does not appear in what we know of the chronicles and hagiographies of this tradition. He was born in 1243 and was ordained at the age of nine; since the monks who perform the function of mkhan po in ordinations are usually of middle age, he would have been more than one hundred years old at the time Klong chen rab 'byams is supposed to have received teachings from him.

Under the leadership of his powerful mother, Khri-ma-lod, and his ministers and generals during the early part of his reign, Tibet continued to maintain and even expand its territory. It has the advantage of being particularly detailed for the period of interest to us here, on the one hand, and of having been the subject of a very correct English translation Roerich, 1949, 1953, 1976 which, above all, has an extremely well-done index.
