Students with Behavioral or Emotional Problems

To reduce the dropout rate for students with learning and attention issues, schools need to focus on improving school climate as well as addressing instructional needs.

time rather than full-time and to earn less than individuals with or without other disabilities. The dropout rate for students with learning disabilities is nearly three times the rate for all students.

Students with Behavioral or Emotional Problems

Department of Education 2002 found that these students had the highest drop out rate of any group with as much as 51 percent leaving before earning a high school diploma. However, discretion should be used when doing these assessments because of the nature in their.

Working with Emotionally and Behaviorally Challenged Students

Instead of reprimanding these students for their lapses, build in short rest periods or mini-breaks into the school day. Students with behavioral or emotional problems are more prone to disruptive classroom behaviors. Because ESSA allows states to choose an additional indicator, there is a clear opportunity for states to help develop positive environments that engage all learners.
