Basic Principles of Theosophy

The struggle for existence is the method adopted by them to test living organisms, and to find out which of them will develop in that struggle those characteristics which build types steadily approximating to the archetypes.

Another article written during this early period was contributed by a Tibetan monk-librarian who was said to be a member of the Theosophical Society. It never ordinarily goes far from the physical body, except when a portion of it is pushed out during anesthesia or is exuded as ectoplasm by spiritualistic mediums. There is beginning, middle, end; which end is a new beginning.
