Our estimates reveal that changes in property rights, institutional changes breaking with the traditional organization of production and growing markets for agricultural products made peasants increase production and productivity. The outside forces, markets and institutions, are also highlighted in other studies of France e. Unique data from Sweden, consisting of more than 80,000 observations of farm production output for the period 1700—1860, are used to calculate and explain decisive changes in pre-industrial agricultural production.

Production development is shown in and. The crop share of the total value of production increased over time, due partly to an expanded crop production and partly to animal production decreasing over time. Abstract The dating of, and explanation for, the agricultural revolution in Europe remains an elusive research task.
