He then returned to hard work on the first two sections of his work and published little except a short treatise on optics Tractatus opticus included in the collection of scientific tracts published by Mersenne as Cogitata physico-mathematica in 1644. It has been argued that three of the discourses in the 1620 publication known as Horea Subsecivae: Observations and Discourses also represent the work of Hobbes from this period.

In October 1679 Hobbes suffered a bladder disorder, and then a paralytic stroke, from which he died on 4 December 1679, aged 91. For example, he argued repeatedly that there are no incorporeal substances, and that all things, including human thoughts, and even God, heaven, and hell are corporeal, matter in motion.
