James William, 1849-1920, ed. The earliest of these documents thus far found is one from Innocent III, hearing date of February 13, 1206, and the mention therein of Greenland sets at rest, finally and absolutely, the long disputed question of the discovery of America by Norsemen several centuries before the time of Columbus. THORSTEIN ERICSSON WEDS GUDRID; APPARITIONS. The country there was a wooded wilderness, as far as they could see, with scarcely an open space; and when they had journeyed a considerable distance, a river flowed down from the east toward the west. The second winter he spent at Ericsholms beyond Hvarfsgnipa.

The same summer that Karlsefni arrived from Wineland, a ship from Norway arrived in Greenland. The entire story has a decidedly fabulous appearance, and, as has been suggested by a learned editor of the saga, a romantic cast, which is not consonant with the character of the history in which it appears. They occupied themselves exclusively with the exploration of the country.
