These concerns have led him into opera, ballet, and filmmaking; he is also an accomplished composer and poet, and his achievement Tom Phillips is a multi-talented artist whose central passion is language and whose genius lies in his ability to generate images that, while concerned with the structure of ideas, also convey a rich coherence of decoration, eloquence, and sensuality. Phillips says that he has never sat down and read A Human Document cover-to-cover in his many decades working with the text, but has spent so much time combing through its pages that he has become familiar with the story and its characters, and above all else, its use of language. On the meta-textual level, however, A Humument seems to be primarily concerned with history — of its source text, of the world in which that text went mostly overlooked for many decades, and even of its own transformative process.
