Lincoln Documents Accompanied Donner Party on Its Grim Journey

The First Relief rescue team arrived February 19, 1847. This was doubtless unjust, for when Joseph Rhinehart was dying, some weeks later, in George Donner's tent, he confessed that he Rhinehart had something to do with the murder of Wolfinger. On July 20, 1846, the company divided, with most of the wagon train then turning north toward Fort Hall modern southeastern and using the well-known to continue the journey west.

A-C, for example, would indicate a quarto volume composed of three signatures or gatherings of eight pages each for a total of 24 pages. They then learned that the train which preceded them had been compelled to travel very slowly down the Weber River, filling in many irregular places with brush and dirt; that at last they had reached a place where vast perpendicular pillars of rock approached so closely on either side that the river had barely space to flow between, and just here the water plunged over a precipice. .

Beyond Cannibalism: The True Story of the Donner Party

Reed reached Sutter's Fort she found these valuables awaiting her. Thankfully, the author didn't focus heavily on the disturbing parts, but told the entire story in a matter of fact, yet compassionate, way.

When the fourth rescue party reached him in April 1847, he was the only survivor. The two other rescuers each grabbed a single child and started hoofing it back down the slope, but Stark was unwilling to leave anyone behind. He died in 1895, nearly half a century after the events that defined him in the public eye.

I can't imagine that level of starvation, where you're eating bits of rug and ground-up bone jelly to survive.

Donner Party Rescued

Without friend or kinsman, Halloran had joined the train, and was traveling to California in hopes that a change of climate might effect a cure.

History of the Donner Party: A Tragedy of the Sierra

Five members of the party, now living, claim to have been eyewitnesses. No one could answer, and the mother's cheek grew paler and her dear eyes grew sadder and more hopeless, until Virginia and Patty both feared that she, too, was going to leave them.
