Jean Froissart, Chronicles

In the mean time, they recommended sending a well informed messenger, to duke Albert in Holland, to acquaint him with what was passing, and have his advice. When the Genoways felt the arrows piercing through heads arms and breasts, many of them cast down their crossbows and did cut their strings and returned discomfited.

In 1816 it was returned, and it has been in The Hague ever since. Froissart began his work on them when but twenty years old, in 1357; they were not completed until 1400.

Froissart: Preface, Ch. 1

Many knights and squires from foreign lands made preparations to attend it: some to see the manners of the English, others to take part in the tournaments.

Chronicles of Froissart

When each had chosen a spot of ground to encamp himself on, the lords retired apart, to consider what would be the best method to force the Scots to battle, considering the situation of the country in which they were. When they had told the cause of their mission, the count said he gave many thanks to the king, queen, and the lords by whose counsel they were sent thither, to do him so much honour; and who on such an occasion had sent such able men that he most willingly complied with their request, if the pope and the holy church of Rome were agreeable to the demand. Pol, as the best knight at this tournament, and that for the tenants to the earl of Huntingdon.
