Google Earth and sustainable development education: examples from human and physical geography

Abstract

Google Earth is a web-based virtual globe that has been developed as one of the most powerful tools for teaching and learning geography. This paper explores the use of Google Earth in the context of sustainable development education, and illustrates the ways in which it can be used to enhance learning and understanding of global issues.

Higher Education Research (2008) identified that Google Earth is being used increasingly in a variety of contexts, including teaching, learning, and research. This paper explores the use of Google Earth in the context of sustainable development education, and illustrates the ways in which it can be used to enhance learning and understanding of global issues.
