Japan and East Asia; the new international order [by] Donald C. Hellmann

Japan is presently seeking to improve its relations with China and has made some progress since 2015. The two processes of globalization and regionalization are articulated within the same larger process of global structural transformation, the outcome of which depends on a dialectical rather than linear development. China has challenged or spoiled existing laws and institutions most consistently on regional security issues.

As already noted, the fluidity of the regional strategic environment, the rise of regional states and the availability of arms for sale and cash with which to finance arms modernization have shaped arms acquisition in the past few years. For Japan, multilateral institutions should not just be used to deal with a rising China, but also to help create a more peaceful and stable regional order. Additionally, China will likely seek to identify and expand any gaps between the United States and Japan.
