Opening @ The by Gavin Evans

On the contrary, he decided to show his audience the world through his eyes: we would see the windmills, but also the giants. During the narrative, he loses his ability to distinguish between his unconscious fantasies and the metropolis, so that, effectively, he becomes a member of the audience. For all the gloss of The Matrix, if we are living in a simulated world, it undoubtedly bears most resemblance to the one in World on a Wire.

It's a miracle that Terry Gilliam's Time Bandits even got made

And from a technical standpoint, La jetée and 12 Monkeys are marvels. The technique, also known as perspective distortion, uses axial magnification to distort the edges of the frame while maintaining a less distorted central focus. The lines between truth and fiction blur, and Gilliam says now that the long road to completing his film has definitively informed the film that will finally premiere in Cannes tomorrow night. She begins to retreat deeper and deeper into her own mind, exploring the tall grass around the farmhouse, relying on her doll heads for friendship.

Strange, I always thought switching minds was a utopian joke.

For example, Godard implies his satirical view of dystopian technology as nothing more than a voice without a physical entity. Perhaps there are two Meanings.
