This was the first real teaching I had enjoyed; and I may say that George Hogarth was the first person who recognised in me any capacity above common-place, and who incited and encouraged me to improve. Combe's address, delivered at the Anniversary Celebration of the birth of Spurzheim, and the organiza- tion of the Boston Phrenological Society, Dec. William Paul had a large brain, in which the organs of the propensities and intellect were largely developed relatively to those of the moral sentiments, as I learned many years afterwards from a very faithful although inartistic portrait of him by Kay—a man famous in Edinburgh in those days as a publisher of portraits of local celebrities, and occasionally of caricatures, drawn and engraved by himself.
