If agreeing on common terms is a challenge in South Korea, imagine what it's like between the North and the South which have had close to zero linguistic contact over more than a half century, during which vast amounts of new terms have been introduced to each. South Korea didn't take such a drastic measure as to forbid using Chinese characters to write Sino-Korean words, but in all the textbooks only the Korean alphabet was used to write Korean.

Constructions of Identity and Threat in North Korea's "Diplomatic War" Discourse

Bigger towns already had Sino-Korean names given by Koreans, but Japanese colonial administrators extended this to the smaller place names which had remained exclusively native Korean until then. The language was beginning to be standardized before political division into the North and South, and even then, Seoul and Pyongyang are in the same dialect area.

Moreover, there was always a fair amount of cultural interchange between the two Germanies. This example also illustrates that by and large, language regulation tends to be conservative but is also driven by natural language evolution rather than vice versa. Many of you may not be very familiar with how language planning works, if you're only familiar with English and other unregulated languages.
