The Periphery as the Core: The Third World and Security Studies

Ayoob addresses what he perceives as the major underlying cause of conflict and insecurity in the Third World - the early stage of state making at which postcolonial states find themselves - drawing comparisons with the West European experience. Pluralism A tradition in international relations that argued that politics, and hence policy, was the product of a myriad of competing interests, hence depriving the state of any independent status. Structuralism A much misused term for any science, pseudo-science or critical method which finds the significance of human things especially social and cultural products in their structure.

Introduction: Redefining the Third World?

The challenges facing the global south: perspectives from the Philippines

New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1987. Its prime focus is on the transformation of three basic parameters: one at the micro level of individuals, another at the micro-macro level where individuals and their collectivities interact, and the third is at the macro level of collectivities and their global structures.

Theories of IR, O

Whereas states in the global north are more outward looking in terms of the sources of security threats, for instance, those in the global south have a more inward orientation: insecurity for most of these states originate from within their borders instead of from without. Sociological Liberalism argues that IR is not only about state to state relations but is also about transnational relations, i.

Theories of IR, O

In: Un simbol în pericol. Schema theorists propose that opinions are structured by cognitive frameworks of knowledge about a group, an event, a person, or an abstract concept, which include both knowledge of concept and associations to related concepts.
