All that sparkles: the life of Queen Henrietta Maria of France

Her marriage to Charles had been a dynastic match to advance diplomatic ties between England and France, and negotiations had been particularly delicate because this was the first cross-confessional marriage of a Protestant heir to the throne to a Catholic princess.

By 1622, Henrietta Maria was living in Paris with a household of some 200 staff, and marriage plans were being discussed. These concepts of power find concurrence in modern times as well as in non-European cultures. She was never to see her husband again and news of his execution in 1649 came as a profound shock.

After all, she had an independent income generated through her jointure, or marriage settlement, totalling more than £28,000 by 1630, an immense sum. In summer he would join the queen on her royal progresses across the country; in the winter he would partake in the court theatricals.

Henrietta Maria herself, as she moved through these spaces, added to the complexity of their messages; for instance, the textiles of her dresses were green to suggest fertility or, so often, black to acknowledge loss, of her husband certainly but also of her status.
