Developments in international law now mean that the reasons for which immunity ratione materiae are conferred simply do not apply to prosecutions for international crimes. This is a well established rule of customary international law going back to the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, restated many times since.

Germany and the New Global Order: The Country's Power Resources Reassessed

It has been argued that acts which amount to international crimes cannot amount to acts performed in the exercise of diplomatic functions because the definition of diplomatic functions in Article 3 of the VCDR limits them to acts within the limits of international law. The Bundesrat is entitled to make comments on the draft law, to which the Federal Government may respond.
