

Scours in sheep and goats in Oregon

Agricultural Experiment Station, Oregon State Agricultural College - Lambs and White Scours

Description: -

B. Internal parasites can live in sheep and goats for a long time and may interfere with nutrients, cause diarrhea, and result in poor performance.

- Common internal parasites are lungworms, stomach and intestinal worms, liver flukes, and coccidia.
- A good, sound worming program is necessary for successful production.

C. Diseases can drastically affect sheep and goats.

- Veterinarians help producers manage flock or herd health.

Scours in sheep and goats in Oregon

Resin Toxins — Resin toxins make up a smaller group of toxins generally presenting with signs and symptoms including incoordination, salivation, bloat, weakness, muscle spasm, coma, and death. Leptospirosis Sheep are generally more resistant to leptospirosis than cattle, swine, and most other domestic animals.

Black scour worm

From what I can recall, the buckling had never been wormed, neither had 2 of the does. Prevention is to buy virgin or disease-free rams, to subject rams to diagnostic testing, and to cull affected rams.

Scours

Adequate consumption is a limitation to the effectiveness of all coccidiostats.

Intestinal Diseases in Sheep and Goats

The feeds are rapidly fermented in the gut, resulting in large quantities of lactic acid being produced, which lowers the pH in the rumen.

Dealing with Goat Scours

Adequate ingestion of colostrum by newborns decreases the incidence of the disease.
