The merging of knowledge : people in poverty and academics thinking together (Book, 2007) [metrics.learnindialearn.in]

Each individual participates both as an actor and as the author of his or her own thoughts and actions, possessing a knowledge that is recognized by other participants. In New Orleans, we recently began a Stoop Talk project, getting neighbors together to discuss common issues facing them on one of their stoops. Most Merging Knowledge projects start with these smaller, more informal groups.

THE MERGING OF KNOWLEDGE PEOPLE IN POVERTY AND ACADEMICS THINKING TOGETHER

Through the collective effort of academics and individuals living in extreme poverty to understand each other, this 'emerging of knowledge' yields important new insights on questions of history, family, knowledge, work, and citizenship. Preliminary results are discussed to illustrate how they are likely to challenge received opinion.

What is Merging Knowledge?

The prerequisites are: Be aware that change is necessary: Extreme poverty is not an inevitable fact of life. They should be collectively involved and recognized as holders of knowledge related to their life experiences. Challenges and ethical issues The merging of knowledge, like participation, is not an end in itself.

Poverty in All Its Forms: Determining the Dimensions of Poverty Through Merging Knowledge

It is not a matter of advocating for singular or uniform knowledge, or for some kind of synthesis of different types of knowledge. Merging Knowledge Merging Knowledge is a methodology developed over decades of work alongside people living in persistent poverty that makes the honest exchange of ideas between people of different backgrounds possible. The starting point for building merged knowledge is an analysis of the lived experiences of people living with poverty and exclusion.

The Merging Of Knowledge People In Poverty And Academics Thinking Together PDF Book

This means creating the conditions which will allow them to build on their own knowledge: taking a step back to review their experience, looking at their experience in the light of that of others to generate broader lessons, and to supporting them as they try to understand the other participants. With regard to those people living in poverty The role of the discussion facilitators is to help the people living in poverty to express themselves in their own words without trying to take their place or put words in their mouths.

What is Merging Knowledge?

The meeting of these three different and complementary forms of knowledge produces more accurate knowledge and more effective methods of action against poverty.
