Eight major rivers can be accessed from the North Sea through the estuary: the , , , , , and . The dedication stone of the Roman theatre was among the most significant finds and is unusual as the only recorded epigraphic mention of a magistrate in Roman Britain. Although not large, the assemblage of animal bones from this site is the first from Brough to be analysed adequately.

Other recognisable features included a T-shaped corn-drier, human graves, both cremation and inhumation, and possible ritual animal burials. The produce from this industry shows strong Continental affinities, drawing on traditions prevalent in the southern part of the Upper Rhine, and may indicate the presence of immigrant potters.
