These are the best we know of the life of individual man.

This is an interesting book in that John Glassco may have written it when young, then finished it when ill and older. Boyle at the time was working on her re-issue of Robert McAlmon's autobiography, Being Geniuses Together, and sought Glassco's help for her own supplementary chapters.

I have a feeling of it around me, though I finished it more than two weeks ago. Now that's what I call a house party. Yet it's true to the spirit of the times, by someone who was there, and is thoroughly engaging.

In 1928, nineteen-year-old John Glassco escaped Montreal and his overbearing father for the wilder shores of Montparnasse. In the end, Glassco leaves Paris on a much more sour note than that with which he had arrived. John Glassco is a Canadian poet I had not heard of previously.

Barely out of Magill College at age 19, he and fellow Canadian youth Graeme Taylor, dove into the all night cafÃ© and party scenes, the brothels, the promiscuity, the bisexual experimentation, the nightclubs and the drinking, as well as the intellectual scene. The most recent addition to my an ever-growing shelf of books about 1920s-era Paris.

It would be difficult, I think, to discuss this book without referencing Hemingway's A Moveable Feast. What Glassco tells us he was the ecstatic lover of Paris, the victim of fate and fatal women is so thickly applied in the layers of the book that we despair of ever finding out what he really was underneath.
