The group of deposits is termed the Renmark Group and was earlier known as the Knight Group. The discovery of thorian-brannerite absite in the Crocker Well area in 1951 led to the establishment of an exploration camp and to a geological survey investigation which has extended over the past five years. The geological information has provided information which has been reduced to map form for the guidance of prospectors.

The Murray River gorge as observed today was incised following this episode. One minor sea incursion resulted in late Eocene resulted in the Buccleuch Formation in South Australia. The basin was named when the Clarence Basin named after the and Moreton Basin in Queensland were proved to be one structure.
